After watching this very impactful video, I think what affected me the most was when he talked about life's obstacles and helping others achieve their goals. We live in a world where not everyone is the most positive but if we took a little bit of time in our day to help others, then it would cause everyone to reach their goals a little bit easier. This will also help with setbacks and getting put back on your feet to get the determination to achieve such goals. Something that I resonated with was when he started talking about being honest to others rather than being “cool” and trying to maintain some sort of social presence. I like to dabble in my clothes and taste in music but that does not differ from the person I truly am. I try to be equal to everyone I meet whether it's in a moment of helping someone out or just a little chat on the way to class. The last lecture was a deep yet informative video based on Randy Pausch's tips on how to be better to other people but also to yourself. His optimism while facing death is truly inspiring and I will always appreciate him for giving that lecture.
